

JENNY KILLED DURING YAVNEH PURIM PARTY

By Talia Harris and Malka Duman

Years 8-11 turned up at the Bayit for what they thought would be an innocent Yavneh Purim Party. The girls were utterly horrified upon opening the doors of the Bayit, only to find blood splattered across the hall. There were skulls dangling from ceiling, as well as vicious spiders and mangled body parts.

Pocahontas instructed everyone to sit down quietly, everyone expecting a kumsitz. Out of nowhere, about 15 zombies appeared, drenched in blood, with tattered clothing and haunted grins that faintly resembled year 12.

“Looking to our year 13 for help, we found that they were bats and seemed only intent of freaking us out.

“A Jewish Grammar runaway and Pocahontas were there but for some reason the zombies left them alone. After a series of challenges we were able to uncover who killed Jenny....”

The pig - a universal symbol of a non-kosher animal - appears to all who look at it that it is in fact a kosher animal. But only by knowing what's actually happening inside the animal - that it doesn't chew its own cud - can one know that the pig is completely non-kosher.

This teaches us a very valuable lesson about us. A person could show all of the external signs and traits of being a certain kind of person, but inside, like the pig, is actually someone completely different.

One of the most important foundations someone needs to have in order for him to feel good about himself and have high self-esteem is to be consistent with who he is both externally and internally. Just like for an animal to be kosher it must have the signs on both its outside and inside, we must strive to do the same.

However, there are times when you should act a little differently than who you normally are. For example, on a job interview your manners might be better than they usually are. Or meeting a very important person your manners are different than around your friends. But if you present yourself as someone completely different that you really are, then this is just like the pig. A great sight for all who look at it, but inside is secretly the exact opposite. Acting better in certain surroundings is fine, but being a completely different person makes you a fraud.

So, which is the real person: the public one or the private one? The lesson that God is teaching us is that it's who the person is on the inside - when he or she is outside of public view - that largely determines the real "you." And when you refine the character of that person - the one the outside world rarely sees - then you'll never be living a life of deception. Try for one day to live your entire day as though everything you do - both in public and private - is being shown on a huge screen in Times Square for the whole world to see. And as the inside "you" begins to transform into the outside "you", you'll begin feeling so much happier because you won't be living a life of deceit but rather one of honesty, growth, and truth.

Impossible

A Yavneh Pupil

I ran through endless corridors, down stairs that never end.
I broke the priceless artefact, the queen had given to lend.
I stand on edge of a cliff, unable to move or run.
The people around throw calculators in pools, as forms of fun.
I battle pizza monsters with Sir Camelot, the knight.
I ride on giant seahorses that grow whilst in the light.
I've sprouted wings, made of lead; they took me to the sky.
Cloudians that sit on clouds wave as they float by.
I'm falling, falling off the tower. I cannot seem to stop.
Aliens seem to want the jewel I know I haven't got.
The President also wants to know how dolphins are often fed.
That's the last I ever eat cheese just before bed.

Yavneh's Own Aspiring Medics

by Charlotte Zimmel

Since the beginning of the year, Dania and myself have had the pleasure of holding weekly sessions in which we discuss current medical ethical issues, tips and tricks on how to boost UCAS forms and the general cultural and social impact health care has on a society. We also spent some time discussing how medicine not only relies on biology, but also how it is a synthesis of all three core sciences.

We have also had the honour of hearing Dr. Sandi Mann speak about her work on psychology and her personal academic career. Right at the beginning of the year, we had a useful discussion with a newly graduated student doctor and the struggles she faces and her general experiences.

Medical society is a great chance for girls with a love for any type of science who want to learn more than what is expected of them to simply pass their exams. Dania and myself work hard to supply our amazing girls with the demand they require, whether that be discussing current events, what A levels to choose, or what career they would best be suited to. Recently we have been investigating different types of health care system and how that not only has an effect on the people receiving treatment, but also on the government and general attitudes towards society in that region. With the race for the White House in the USA taking up a lot of media attention, we have had lengthy debates on America's seemingly unfair health care system.

We are open to all ideas you may have and we would love to see more of you come! As previously stated, you do not have to have an interest in only medicine. You can find us in the room in the hall at 1:00 on a thursday.
